

The World Needs of Failures

Osher Volotker

© Osher Volotker, 2025. All rights reserved.

No part of this story may be reproduced, distributed, or used without the author's written permission.

Introduction

Earth. Our fragile planet was created millions of years ago and has shaped its form and creation to allow atmosphere, gravity, liquid, land, and life on its surface.

Our world has undergone many changes to reach its true potential, allow nature and life to exist, sustain a functional system for living organisms, and support that system.

When humankind was created, its knowledge and evolution helped it develop as a race, grow stronger and wiser, and evolve over the years to come. Although humanity uses its abilities for harm, there is always a reasonable purpose behind it.

Countries and Power

Over time, humans grow in numbers, power, wealth, and territory. A strong country is not defined by the one with the most enormous military force but by the one that gathers all its people working together and contributing to its nation. How did it come into motion? When factories provide the products, the military provide men's power, schools provide national pride and education, and governments provide control.

When it comes to humans, nothing is perfect. They always put themselves before anyone else and set out to improve their private lives for a better and happier one.

Governments and empires of the past couldn't control this human pursuit of self-preservation, which led to laws, taxes, and hard leadership from leaders on their people, sometimes deliberately. For a nation to survive and remain powerful, it has to consist of everyone; otherwise, it could collapse and create chaos within its borders or be taken over by another nation.

Therefore, leaders worldwide learned that every country they rule under their flags must remain under control and oppress the thought of freedom. They knew that every man and woman would need to support the country, even if they disagreed with their ideology.

This way, a country can continue growing the economy and supporting civilian life. It can also create more defenses against other nations that would want a piece of that wealth and power, not always necessarily through an act of war.

The Failure System

This brings us to today's 20th century when many nations have become very powerful and wealthy, but some remained at the bottom of the list. Humans have created many things today that provide jobs, improved education systems, and ways to contribute to their nation. This way, nations help everyone create a good life for themselves, but not everyone will get a piece of it. Why? It's not because they don't deserve it, are unworthy, or didn't come from a wealthy background. It's because the world needs a failure. What does a failure mean to people?

Well, a failure can mean a lot of things:

- You can fail a math test.
- You can fail to get a job.
- You can fail in your marriage.
- You can fail to achieve something you always wanted.

The list goes on, but failure is essential in our lives, for it teaches us a lot about ourselves and the world. Many people view failure as a bad thing and end up on the wrong side of it.

Failure tells us we are not worthless but on stand-by or given a different direction. We must keep contributing to the world's needs, and in time, we will have our chance to achieve whatever we want. Unfortunately, not everyone will have this chance. This is why 1% will live a successful life, while the other 99% will have to fail to save the world.

Job classes

The purpose of job classes is to divide the people by salary and education gains.

There are 2 tiers classes: the low class and high class. Let's imagine a manufacturing plant that creates more and more of the same products that sustain human or environmental survival. Humans are also considered a "tool" of manufacturing. They are to produce the products in a manufacturing plant; as products are made daily, a new human must step into the production line to keep the process going and replace the old one.

Sometimes, workers stay in this job for years or even forever, sometimes getting promotions and benefits. If we take a gas station, which is not very popular and has been used as a temporary job for younger people, new employees always step into the job to keep providing gas.

Low-class jobs are essential for human and natural survival. They provide the most important things the world needs but are not counted as high-class jobs by education and salary. You won't need a degree to work as a cashier; low-class jobs always have room for more people to join in, while high-class jobs won't need many; only a few who passed or got lucky will get to work in high-class jobs. Money is a massive factor in high-class employment, as it pays the most to a small group of people, while the lower class gets paid less to a higher group. The money factor creates balance for high-class corporations to hire only those seen as perfect for the job, for they will make a lot of money from them and be rewarded for having a piece of that. Corporations of the low class are constantly gaining full government support to roll more money into them. Still, the low payment to workers will not change for education reasons and the ranking of human society (poor, middle, rich, powerful).

The high class provide a good lifestyle that only a handful of people will enjoy. Ultimately, if everyone gets it, no one will stay at the bottom and sustain our way of life. Everyone hopes one day they will reach the top and not settle at the bottom.

Essential vs None essential

If we look closely at why it's an issue to pay more to essential workers than not essential workers, it's because it creates a race of time between them. Whoever saves the most time wins their lives. Whether both are well paid, the time factor significantly impacts a person's choices.

A student studying in the medical field will go to university and study for 7-10 years; a man who is 23 years old with no experience or degree is working at a gas station. The 23-year-old makes 10000 dollars a month for an essential job; he can live well, travel, and not worry much about anything. On the other hand, the student will have to wait to earn his degree, and when he finally starts working as a doctor, he will make the same amount of money as the gas station worker. That is a race he lost over time. If the student's dream is to become a doctor, he should follow it, but when money and time are involved, people will drop their dreams just to be well-paid and save time. Being a doctor is an essential job, the same as a gas worker, but it is considered a high-class job that comes with years of waiting. The student will eventually drop his dream and settle for a low-class job, and then there will not be enough doctors.

Military

The purpose of the military has always been security, which has undergone many changes throughout history, whether through tactics, laws, or warfare.

The military is quite the same as the manufacturing plant, but the opposite. Its job is to maintain a good defense of its nation's borders, but when humanity's numbers grow far too much, its job is to wage wars, lose some of the men's power, and then recruit more.

The military was created because of humanity's desire for destruction. Every nation seeks to empower itself beyond the imaginable, spread fear, and become the dominant nation on the face of the earth. History has repeatedly shown this, such as the British Empire, the Mongol Empire, etc.

The military is a business that contributes to the world by losing men's power but can also damage the world with its purpose. Nuclear weapons are weapons that cannot be used at all; just one bomb dropped, and it can create environmental disasters and kill millions. We should ask ourselves, why do countries still keep those weapons and not disarm them? Well, the answer is to keep enemies at bay from attacking at all. If a nation falls, they will take everyone with them rather than lose. Nuclear weapons can also be considered as a "plan B" for us. If we turn against our nations by the millions, try to overthrow them, and change the world order, they can use it against us.

Not everyone wants to join the military, and many countries allow freedom of choice. Still, those who couldn't find a good path to a better life will most likely choose a military career, and the military will always come with benefits that make people's lives even better than a civilian sometimes. Israel, a small nation, must keep recruiting people from the age of 18 and above, as the country could have a low rate of motivation and national pride to join for service, but also by its numbers. Suppose they force people to join, and they refuse. In that case, they can risk time in prison, and not doing military service will close many job opportunities for people regardless of education or experience.

Many employers in Israel will always ask if a person did military service, not because it's an education requirement or experience gained. Still, it's a strategic fear that the government made to force people to do military service, and it can change their life decisions to the point some might stay in the military and build a career there. As a result, they will drop out of higher education to pursue something they want to do. In Israel, not all places seem to do that, but some do, and it can be frustrating that some will be affected and won't be hired because they abstain from military service, regardless of their education.

It's important to remember that some countries require this control to keep the military strong and the numbers high enough. People will be required to sacrifice some years of their lives to be recruited into military service so they can protect their nation.

Times of War and Times of Peace

There is a thin line between times of peace and times of war. In times of peace, when a person is motivated to join the military and ready to serve and protect, he most likely won't be accepted because of health conditions or other tests he failed.

In times of war, the chances of the same person will be higher; as war wages on, nations don't care for tests or IQ; they want numbers to send out.

We all hear many stories of people who wanted to serve and were rejected, but they were accepted and served. In WWI, about 250,000 teenagers and children under 18 fought in that war.

Now, most people know some nations need to defend themselves from their enemies and that forcing people to join is for a good cause. Well, it is in our world, but if we lived in a world where nations would help each other and stop waging wars, we wouldn't need the military or spend a high budget on a military force.

Some countries have small armies not by choice but because of their poor economies. They keep the army small but strong enough to defend its borders. It's enough so the country can keep itself above water so they won't drown.

The military is also an asset. When a nation runs out of resources, it will invade and wage war to restore the balance it needs.

Territorial Space

Humans have taken up a lot of space on this planet. We can always hear more forests being taken down, beautiful nature places being gone to become cities for people, and animals being driven out of their natural places and sent to zoos or other areas. With so much space taken, humans will have almost nothing left. There will always be a need for destruction, which can come through war, virus, or relocation. When people die, they are buried in the ground, but today, we can see that there are graves above ground in floors or tombs. A lot of people die each year, possibly millions. How can the governments keep space for all those graves? Well, maybe they don't. How many people know their grandfathers who lived 300 years ago? Possibly none, unless he was a famous figure and if there is historical evidence. Many do not know their ancestors from around 200-300 years ago. This gives nations a chance to dig up graves and make room; whether something is inside or not, they will remove it and burn it to ashes. Space is something they always have to clear out. Once one is gone, another takes its place.

The Education System

The educational system is the strategic part of a nation that strengthens people's loyalty and teaches them how to contribute to their country.

The educational system is divided into three tiers: middle school, high school, and higher education. Each tier approaches its education level differently.

The middle school approach is to teach the basics of communication and nationality pride. Students must learn the language and basic subjects so that later on, they can move on to the high school tier. In middle school, your education is based on nationality; you will be taught national pride, so you will want to become a part of it and defend it, and most likely won't consider living in a different country. Apart from national pride, students will mostly be learning their country's history rather than major vital things that are needed or could be taught, such as other nations' history or conflicts between nations to encourage thinking beyond their nationality zone. History is taught in small bits. A lot of people consider the "white" nations as colonizers, occupiers, and conquerors, but if you dig deeper into history, you will find that the Islamic world has done it too. This can be dangerous for a nation because people are taught only the last 100-200 years of history. A student who lives in a "white" nation learns America had slavery back in the 18th century. This could turn people against their nation, as we can see today. No matter if countries try to hide their history, there will always be someone to uncover it and use it against their nation; this can come mainly from minority groups that usually are not the native population. This can create enemies within a nation, something governments do not want.

There were devastating events in history that not many know of. Mao Zedong was a leader in China, and under his rule, around 40-70 million people died. Leopold, the second of Belgium, killed around 5-10 million Africans. Jews have suffered for thousands of years from expulsions, massacres, and genocides. They could probably not even know of other holocausts that could have happened in the past other than WW2 and were forgotten or erased from history.

Educating students about the world will not only encourage outside thinking and expand students' knowledge, but it can also prevent future national conflicts. If a nation hides history from its people, It can make people speculate what secrets their nation holds that can lead to a civil war or a revolution that can come from minority groups living in that nation. Sometimes, it can be the natives, like in China, as we hear stories of the Chinese government controlling everything and forcing their false education onto its people. Some discover the lies and protest against them, and some still follow.

High school education is a continuation of pride nationality with extra deep learning of basic subjects, like math. Still, it is more focused on grades and reaching the edge where a student's life might be a failure or success. The high school focuses on helping students find their talents but does not always do that. As you learn subjects in school only to be graded by them, and later, it will place you on a scale of success or failure, which either opens doors for you or closes them.

This education system is meant for a person to focus on non-basic subjects they might never use; instead of finding their true talents, improving them, and gaining experience in them, students will waste time searching for them and never will genuinely discover their potential. They can end up working in low-class jobs, jobs they don't like or are good at, and they will settle for those jobs to survive. Most of the time, they will choose a subject to study in the higher education system that they don't even understand or will ever find satisfaction with.

When a person arrives at higher education and picks a subject he is interested in learning, he might not be accepted because he failed subjects he didn't like or understand in high school education, and from here, it's a strategic tool to change people's lives and decisions.

The higher education system, the only system that will make people feel important and more intelligent with what they can achieve from learning under that system, is now made to be the ultimate breakthrough for a person in their life to become big, important people or become absolutely nothing. This system cannot and will not accept everyone, and again, not because everyone is not good enough for it; it is just that some must fail, and why? If everyone can learn in this system, achieving degrees and high-class positions jobs, no one would work in the low-class jobs that no one wants.

Everyone wants to become important and successful, but this just cannot work for the world; it will not survive and will slowly kill the human race. Imagine a small town with 100 people living in it, and in that town, there's a food factory, a bank, a gas station, a high-tech company, a grocery store, and a hospital.

This town will allow anyone to study in the higher education system to get whatever they choose. All 100 citizens spend a maximum of years on the subject they chose, and when they return, the only places they have been hired and wanna be hired are the bank, the hospital, and the tech company. As time goes by, everything goes smoothly and well. Another day goes to another week, to another month, but soon enough, the food will run out, and people will starve because no one makes food at the factory, leaving the grocery store empty. The citizens only notice it when the shelves remain empty for days and days. After spending all their gas resources, they can't drive to nearby cities for help. No one was working at the gas station responsible for bringing more gas to the town, and soon enough, the townspeople would create chaos and turn on each other for survival until no one is left, and the city would quickly become a ghost town.

This is why the higher education system works on pay-to-enter laws, so not everyone with good wealth can gain a degree and will have to settle for low-class jobs, which will ensure the world's survival. The higher education system also pays attention to grades from high school. If a person does have good wealth, they can reject them for their grades because they were not good enough to study under that system and must spend more time to achieve better grades, or again settle for low-class jobs. Although from the status of the world today, higher education can accept good wealth and bad grades, some people come with different minds and opinions that will not necessarily make them successful in getting high-class jobs, and the higher education system knows it. Otherwise, they wouldn't take the risk. It is better to lose profit than the world coming to an end.

A common challenge many students face is the burden of student loans, which often act as a strategic obstacle to achieving their dreams. Some students cannot keep up with their debts and abandon their education without completing their degree. Others choose to quit altogether, settling for low-class jobs. Even those who graduate and secure their degree often struggle to pay off their loans while navigating the complicated process of finding a job in their desired field. Unfortunately, even when hired, the salary is not always sufficient to clear their debt quickly, leaving them in prolonged financial stress.

The higher education system plays a significant role in shaping a person's path toward success or failure. Whatever path they choose, this system will insidiously select for them. They will contribute to the nation they were born to so it can continue to thrive and grow stronger, either from survival or strength and defense.

We can understand that the higher education system works in a way that makes it hard for a person to get into or succeed in it, but if you think deeply about this, it's like a win-or-lose strategy. For the win part, you pay a massive amount of money for your studies, earn your degree, and work in a job suited to that degree, and the salary you earn at that job will pay you back for everything you spend.

The losing part involves spending a massive amount of money and, in the end, failing in your studies. If you choose to try again, you have to pay the same amount again, starting from zero. Not only do you lose a lot of money, but your time is also wasted, which could have been used to study something more manageable or to work in a low-class job and earn some money.

The win-or-lose strategy is one that most people in the world are afraid of, but they will not always spend money on higher education studies. They will skip this part, decide to study something different and easy and leave their dream job behind. The problem with society is that they learn to develop fear and want to take the safe route so that they have a high chance of success or less time spent, which throughout life could make significant changes in their social life, private life, and sometimes even their health. People will end up not feeling happy and thus could experience negative thoughts and depression that can impact their mental health and can lead to many bad results. Their social life is influenced by these negative effects, not seen much by the general public, but it does cause people to behave differently. It could express itself as you walk into a bar and see a guy quiet at the corner, but if you accidentally bump into him, he will start a fight with you.

There is a saying: "Never judge anyone unless you know their story and what is going on in their life."

In a small social circle, friends and family might notice this change, especially if it concerns relationship or marriage problems.

The education system can be compared to the children's movie Ant Z (1998), where an ant questions his existence and wants to be a soldier instead of a worker. The queen inspected everyone to where they would be placed within the colony.

Like ants, we have been selected where to work or serve. Today, they give us the freedom of choice, but it's not always an option when, above our heads, we have a queen inspecting us, too. The only difference is that this queen is more invisible and sometimes digital.

The Speed-Run Race

What has become a major societal problem is the speed runner. In the gamer community, a speed runner is a person who can finish a video game with the fastest time. This skill has been used for entertainment or competition purposes, but in the real world, people do that, too. They speed-run their lives: finish school by 18, earn a degree by 25, get married by 27, and have a child by 30.

Every person's life isn't a race, but people compete with each other without even knowing they are in a race to get all that you think you need by age 30. To show everyone you reached the finish line early in your life, but how can anyone know what they want?

People would sometimes follow after their family members and work the same jobs as they did. If a man is out there dating a woman he loves, how can he be sure she is the one for him and with her, only her, he wants a child with? When higher education focuses on challenging and long-time studies, people don't take the time to stop and think if that's what they want or if it's worth it.

There is no shame in marrying at 30, earning a degree by 27, or having a child by 35, but everyone must know what they want for their lives. They need to take the time necessary for each part so they can make the right decision and not regret it. Earning the wrong degree, marrying the wrong person, or having a child you don't want. We all know everyone wants their child to have a piece of themselves embedded into them, but if there is a piece in the child that you no longer love, you will not want this child anymore. Of course, some people love their children unconditionally, but they can't ignore the inner emotions that make them wonder about taking a different path.

Homelessness

What comes into the world as a global problem is homelessness, but homelessness is not just a bad past, lack of money, or a house. It is a strategic move made to ensure people will stay on the streets, for the more people get thrown to the streets, they won't ever be able to recover. Finding jobs is almost impossible because employers find out they are homeless. Getting a person back on their feet is not hard. If a nation will arrange a place for those people and find jobs for them, in a few months, they can be in better shape than surviving each day on the streets scavenging a few bucks for food.

Homeless people often face neglect because helping them become self-sufficient would cost governments too much. This is why welfare was created to give a bit of support to those who can never work again because of a job accident or something, but it doesn't help most of them much or at all in some cases.

Once a person is on the streets without a house or any possessions, they are immediately removed from the system and are no longer valid for support. Everyone has their own story, but in the big picture, they are no longer a government problem.

As mentioned before, through the military, education, and low-class jobs, this form of abandoning citizens is to let others take their places and reduce the number of people in a particular area to create balance.

If governments wanted to strengthen their nation and make zero homeless people on their streets, they would. Each person living under their flag is an expense to the nation's economy, and as a result, it cannot serve everyone. Some must fail along the way and be abandoned.

India has over a billion citizens—the largest in the world.

Although India does not have the highest homeless rate in the world, its government can still have a hard time supporting a billion people, which will collapse the economy and cause chaos in the country.

India is also a good example of why it has a high reasonable rate of active troops ready to defend its country or go to war, as many Indians find military careers a better option to improve their lives. Pakistan considered the top one with the highest homeless rate, can also be seen as one with a high military force.

The Form of Love

Love is an incredible emotion that combines human beings and animals, but is this emotion also used as a system?

Humans and animals have emotions they express, each individual in their way, but let's look back on this emotion history.

Over the centuries, love has transformed many times, both in good and bad ways. In some cultures or periods, love wasn't expressed reasonably, as women were forced to marry men they never knew or ever felt some emotion towards. They married only royalty, sometimes given to prevent wars or create peace between two kingdoms. Kings would offer their women to other kingdom warriors or royalty for good relations.

Most women in history agreed and followed those decisions, accepted their fate, and believed their life's work was to serve their nation by selling their bodies and souls for peace.

This national pride was the most significant success a nation could have in the past; instead of spending billions of dollars, you can offer women in exchange to create alliances or support the country either by military or economic gains, but not all women would agree to this kind of strategic policy. Some tried to resist or escape this horrible fate and live the life they wanted with someone they could truly love. Like Joan of Kent. History showed us that among those women, a few would not gain their freedom and would be executed or be pursued and hated by their people, which would lead to horrible consequences. Kings used this to spread fear and propaganda to keep their people loyal and strengthen the nation's pride. Naturally, we remember that women in the past were also treated as trophies of war. When a nation took over another, women would be taken to marry kings of the conquer.

This practice lasted almost until the 19th century. Some cultures did allow for love-based marriages by permitting women and men to choose their partners. However, this was not widespread across entire nations. In many cases, such practices were limited to regions where people lived differently from their rulers. These communities often formed their laws and, in some instances, considered themselves independent nations or communities.

Male Supremacy

Male privilege existed long ago, but we can still see it today. For instance, surnames carry men's names. Today, this has changed for many reasons, like feminists women, or men agreeing to take their wives' surnames. But why is it going this way that a family with only daughters born will lose their legacy?

The answer is obvious: men were primarily the powerful rulers in the past, and women were to side by them. It was rare that some powerful women took power into their own hands from their husbands or used their husbands' power for their advantage. Men were still considered the supreme gender and could control anything from law to land. They would keep their family legacy and surname. Male-born heirs in many kingdoms would only take the throne despite having daughters ready to take the throne. Women are the ones who give birth, and a child gets to have a special bond with his mother. Mothers are more connected to their children than fathers, and this gift can provide women with more power than men. A man may hold the key for a child, but a woman carries the child inside her for months. The child has more connection to his mother, and she can give her child the chance to take her surname and continue her legacy. Today, we can understand why, in a divorce, a woman always gets the child, although sometimes it is not justified on the father's side.

A surname wouldn't be a big problem if the husband and wife's surnames were combined or each kept it's own, but for the child, within three generations, the surname would be so long that it would be impossible to pronounce. Regardless, men were more powerful than women, so naturally, it just stayed to this day. This creates some competition between the two genders to fight on almost anything. It sounds like marriage, doesn't it?

Under Age Marriage and Human Chapters

Centuries ago, and still happens today in several countries, is the under-age marriage. This was used as a speed production weapon. Many nations out there wouldn't wait years for children to reach their adult age. When they are ready and legal to have children, they force them to get pregnant or join the military at an early age. This was used as a kind of abuse for children.

Underage marriage is used as an excuse for people or royalty to allow access to any underage children. It could express itself as the king walks in the streets of his kingdom and sees a beautiful underage girl, and he wants her, but if there were laws against it, he couldn't have taken her. We can believe that this is how pedophilia was invented in our world, and not just by mental illness, as some say. Another interesting thing is that some people believe child marriage or sexual intercourse with minors is allowed because girls get their periods at the age of 12-13 and not at 18, which makes it look like the almighty allows it.

A lot of people today, mostly sex offenders or just people with an opinion, say that age is just a number. Well, it is just a number, but it also isn't. Age has meaning in a person's life, and it shows in what chapter they reached and when they can move on to the next chapter. The education chapter explains that a child must follow essential communication and social skills in middle school before reaching higher education.

Age also determines your body and health as you grow older. Your body is like milk; it will expire, just like milk. You are not going to stay young and healthy forever. Your body has a timer and a date on it.

Age is a book for every human person, divided into chapters: birth, the baby, the kid, the teen, the adult, the elder, and death.

Therefore, age does matter, and if we mix those chapters, it will not create a healthy, educated person. Instead, we will create a person who missed all their chapters for a chapter they are not ready for yet. If you wanna read a good book and understand its story, you will not skip chapters, won't you? How does it express itself as a failure for the world? Crime offenses, and child trauma. People who are involved with children are sent to prison and destroy their lives with a criminal background. Children who experience trauma can be affected that they won't be able to function probably in society.

The Love System- continued.

Love today has changed for the better. People are free to love anyone they wish, regardless of wealth or position in society, although some things still haunt us from the past. For instance, seeing people from different religions or colors together creates hatred and anger among people. This emotion wasn't something people could use in the past, but they were forced to accept laws and traditions to marry people they didn't love and spend the rest of their lives with, without options or choices. Love is used as a weapon for the production of children so they could get soldiers and workers, but could it be that our leaders found that love is maybe not a real individual emotion but a piece of the sinful Lust within the human body? Lust is obscene but wanted; leaders use it and change it into something beautiful so people will engage in sexual intimacy and will raise their children without regret or have a second opinion. For instance, if there is a man out there who will only engage in creating children for a nation, he would not want to stay with the woman or raise his child, for love is a strong emotion that influences his consciousness from bad to good or right and wrong. Of course, we can understand that love is fundamental in people want to feel loved by others and get interested in one another. We can observe how love changes people's perspective on things we consider lustful and wrong. When we look at a naked woman, we see it as lustful and wrongdoing, but when you look at a naked woman who is your wife, we see it as something beautiful and allowed. When we hear stories of children being abandoned or people being cheated on or divorced, this is where we can see that love is missing in these people's lives. It could be for many reasons, but this results can cause a nation to break down if not well-balanced.

Without this emotion, nations would lose control over their people. Children would not be safely cared for and would be abandoned by their parents to a high degree. Those children need to be cared for in orphanage homes, which can cost a nation a lot of money. Children will grow without warmth and care. Instead of growing up as part of society, they turn to crime and destroy rather than build.

When you have two parents to raise a child and teach him everything about the nation, he will become a part of it, immediately enter the system, and start the process of a military or worker position.

Unfortunately, the emotion of love today is still not used correctly. It does keep serving the purpose nations want, and that's the production of children, but people still marry others they don't know or even love. They keep following the speed runner system, which keeps them occupied on having all their goals achieved before a deadline is reached, but the truth is, there isn't one. Humans create deadlines that draw them away from what is crucial for them to focus on instead of taking the time to consider something they want in life. The speed runner is a giant system created to draw people as fast as possible toward their goals, but honestly, it's the nation's goal they all aim for. Nations use the love system so people will take care of their children and prepare them to serve their country, rather than requiring the nation to waste resources and money caring for abandoned children due to the absence of love from their parents.

The finish line

A nation wants to have the most powerful and wise people on their side, and the best way to get it is by having them running towards their goals. One day, when they reach the finish line, they will receive their rewards, and afterward, they will be free to do whatever they wish. Not always will it go this way, a person who now has a job must keep it, or all his hard work will go to waste. He will also be required to work on his marriage and care for his children, raise them the same way he was raised, and prepare them to enter the same system he entered. Just like that, the circle goes on and on, keeping on spinning and spinning until we all go in circles and repeat the same steps our ancestors took. That may be why our earth is round, to remind us that we are always walking in a circle; no matter where we turn, we will always return to where we started.

Crime

When people get thrown out of the system or do not live a good life in the lower classes, they sometimes can turn to crimes. Like the military, this system is responsible for reducing manpower, either by death or status. We need to ask ourselves, can crimes be stopped altogether? Well, most likely not, but some can be prevented entirely or reduced significantly if nations endorse stricter, harsher laws. Let's take a look at drug crime. Drugs that are being produced require materials. If a country wants to slow down or damage this illegal industry, it could. How? If the government would ban just one crucial material needed for drugs, like cocaine, and make this material accessible only to government bodies. Most illegal materials are also legal for some basic usage. Still, the government can control the ban to provide the required product from that material rather than sell the material itself or place strict laws on it. Governments can't entirely stop drug production; there will always be ways to produce it. However, governments can find ways to reduce the amount of production, save more lives, and possibly educate people to stay away from it. Education is the best killer of criminals, but when you are required to fail, this could be the result.

Humans code

Every human is programmed in the way the nation wants them to be. This code is the same as computer code, like a programmer codes a website to be perfectly built and easy for the user. Every piece of code is required to build the entire system so it will go smoothly and without interference. Human code is something that makes humans behave the way they are and keeps them following that way.

Humans are quite aware that their brain is somewhat a computer system, but they are not aware that some codes in their system are triggered when humans need to behave in a way that benefits their nation or keeps them in order.

Think of the way a man talks to a woman when his intentions are for sexual purposes.

However, His approach is different in the same purpose he seeks to achieve from the woman.

One approach is a code conversion, and the other is pure honesty.

1- Hello, my name is Jack. Would you like to go on a date? You are very pretty. Coded conversation.

2- Hello, my name is Jack, you are gorgeous, would you like to come to my house and sleep with me? Pure honesty.

It is more that he will use flirty tricks, compliments, or talk about stuff that won't always be true. That is a human code. Society taught him to behave this way, and only this way will he be respectful towards women instead of being authentic and honest. The man can still approach the woman and offer her sexual intimacy with him in a respectful way.

After all, women, these days know the art of seduction themselves, so they already know what the man wants, but instead of being honest and real with themselves, their code tells them to keep playing on the man as if he were a toy to keep buy them drinks or anything else they want. When they done, they are ready to give the reward when they play enough, or in some situations, playing is enough. Some people might consider this code to be a hidden code for prostitution as the man pays the woman with products and receives sexual pleasure in return. Now, it does not say women like that are prostitutes, but the code does make it look like it when society thinks this is the proper way men and women should behave.

We can also take the example of women having common words in their vocabulary that they use when they are involved in an argument with a man or any other person, such as "whatever," "I'm fine," or "never mind."

There is a stigma that women always have to discuss important choices in life with their female friends. It is also a form of code. How their friends know what is good for them? Only the woman herself can know, and by asking her friends, it's like they are dating the guy she is dating. This form of code can affect women's lives badly. Their friends can give wrong advice by not fully knowing someone; even if they know that person well, there is no way they know him like a boyfriend or how he is with his closest friends or even alone.

Our way of life is a human code placed in our minds when we grow up to achieve everything by age 30 and not after. We can call it the speed runner code.

The human code is a systematic operation to ensure the continuity of the world where humans will not become unpredictable but predictable; in this way, they can be stopped if they go out of line, and allows the governments to follow their movement and know exactly where they will end. Every individual has their own unique life choices and mindset, which collectively contribute to building a network of workers, soldiers, educators, and doctors in the necessary proportions. This network is often shaped by the needs and designed by the nation, determining where people are most required and why they might work in specific roles or live their lives in particular ways. Human code can also determine the way people behave.

- Russians will always drink vodka.
- British will always drink tea.
- Black people will love basketball.
- A secretary wears a long skirt, blouse, and high heels, while a businessman wears a suit.

Many people say that work clothes represent a "dress code," and they are right. A dress code interacts with your human code, subtly influencing your behavior to align with expected norms. This creates order and peace without relying on force or laws. The moment you adopt the dress code, your behavior changes, often without you noticing. For instance, in a formal meeting, you might avoid telling jokes because the setting demands seriousness. Similarly, wearing jeans and a T-shirt to work might create an unwanted atmosphere that doesn't align with the workplace's professional standards.

But who says you can't come to work and not do your job because of how you dress? The film Fight Club (1999) illustrates this kind of behavior change.

The body art- tattoos

The tattoo culture originated as body art. Tattoos symbolize a meaning in one's life, a phase, a past, or just to look more attractive.

Tattoos today have gained a bad reputation on a person, for it can target him as an ex-criminal. Centuries ago, when tattoos were used for Viking warriors or Maori tribes, it was honorable to have tattoos that symbolized the person as brave, heroic, and fearsome.

At this current timeline, societies and countries changed. Tattoos have taken on different meanings and can sometimes unfairly create a negative perception of a person, potentially impacting their relationships or career. As tattoos across the world made a significant impact on societies, each nation with its own culture changed the tattoos to their image and ideas. When governments saw that people who belong to a biker gang or convicts mark themselves as part of their gang or organization, it gave them an easy profiling tool onto people that they can track, arrest, or even bring down the whole organization. Governments and Police use tattoos as a secondary tool for profiling a person and to find out if his part of a criminal organization. He makes their job much easier by marking himself as a target for tattooing his organization on his body or just tattooing something scary that could get them suspicious. These situations happen almost every day worldwide, from the most minor thing to getting locked up or worse.

In the music industry, we see a lot of tattooed singers and band members, and it is almost impossible to find someone without a tattoo. Imagine a job interviewer asking a musician if he has a tattoo. He answers yes, and just like that, he's hired and officially in the business. The tattoo is a musician's bachelor's degree. The real question is why normal tattooed people get profiled while musicians get past that. It could be because they are famous and it will make big news.

People worldwide should understand the quote: "Don't judge a book by its cover."

A book can't be bad just because its cover has a very scary image. We must be humble towards one another and judge actions over body art.

Police

Among the police forces in the world, we hear a lot about corrupt officers who just joined to get a license to kill and not be bothered by any civilian who will try to save a life. We should never look at police officers as good guys if they don't behave that way; just because they wear a uniform does not change the fact they are breaking the law. Remember the dress code as it affects how we perceive the Police. People will not act when necessary because they believe the Police are just doing their job, and interfering with them would get them arrested.

Those corrupt police officers use this to their advantage. They can target any person they want and not be arrested for it or held accountable for their actions, which gives them more courage to continue doing it. If this behavior is not controlled and stopped, more could join the force to continue fuel more hatred and bloodshed; if we stop the first ones for their actions, the others will fear and will not join the force or might change their ways, and slowly, it can be prevented.

We must remember that we are all but one race, and no one can be above the law, no matter what tattoos, uniforms, political status, or skin color someone has.

Freedom of Expression

Freedom of expression—what exactly does this mean to us? Well, this subject is something we are all happy to use every day in our lives. It helps us express an opinion and not be judged by it; it gives us the right to dress the way we want and not be judged by society; it gives us the right to protest against governments and sometimes be heard by them and make a difference, but freedom of expression can also be dangerous.

Freedom of expression came around the 20th century when many nations changed their laws and allowed women and minority groups to participate by giving all their citizens more rights, proper education, jobs, and sometimes fewer wars.

During war times, countries, no matter what side they were on or what grudge they have for a nation that took some of their lands, will let the past go. It can hurt their economy very severely and can also turn the people against them if they choose to go to war again; the citizens will protest to end the war and replace the government. We can see this in history where, between 1917 and 1923, the Russian people started the Russian Revolution and wanted to end the war with the central powers so its people could restore their economy, get their jobs back, and be able to bring food home. Russia, like so many other nations during the war, forced its people to work extra hours on low pay and even stop their education to help with the war effort; complete chaos spread across Russia at the time that forced Russia to break out of the war.

The Great War ended in 1918, but the revolution continued as Russian parties in the country fought each other for control and power.

Freedom of expression is believed to prevent all that, but it doesn't. Now, instead of massive civilians running with guns in the streets, they stand on roads and hold signs saying: "Quit your job, Prime Minister."

It seemed like an excellent tactic, a policy devised by a brilliant general. He studied how the people could be more dangerous than an entire military force. His goal was to convince the people that using guns was terrible, and that holding a sign was the proper way to bring about change. Using guns will persuade them to act like terrorists.

As a result, governments don't have to worry much about an angry mob raiding them since those mobs are holding signs made of paper and not metal. Protests sometimes work because of social pressure toward the government and voting chances. People don't go to work, roads are blocked, and if a protest damage the nation somehow, it will attract the government's attention. A Government politician believes it will be their chance to be re-elected and make a good name for themselves and their citizens, but that is harder and rarer to do since much of the income that comes into a nation comes from things that disastrously affect the earth.

Protests on global warming and pollution accuse governments of destroying the earth, while governments make a fortune from oil companies, chemical factories, etc.

Another problem with freedom of expression is that it feeds bad information onto a person, such as the history of societies or cults that did things for their ideology and were disbanded by their actions. They created laws that made them superior, and those below must die or serve them.

If those parties were an enemy of society in the past, and justice prevailed. Then why would they still be allowed to be among us today, such as Neo-Nazis, KKK, pro-Palestine?

Today, some of these parties do not turn to violent actions; they just set their opinion and live by it, but for what cost? Why would a person wanna live by hating someone by their skin color or religion? We should ask ourselves what would happen if those parties gained the support of millions. Would they turn violent? Would they build an army and start another great war? Or how about politics? What if a Neo-Nazi member becomes a politician and might vote for laws against Jews?

Political actions are mostly more significant for the entire nation, but sometimes, they can target a few minority communities.

The law works in the way of neutrality when a person has opinions or views on anything and works in a government job, such as a lawyer, Police, doctor, or judge. That person cannot bring his views to work; he must leave them outside his job and treat each individual the same, but it does not happen the way the law wants and demands to happen. Because those people grow up in the wrong way and full of hate, how can they expect to leave all their views at home and smile like nothing is wrong? Freedom of expression is dangerous because it may give freedom to all. Still, it continues to feed hatred of the wrong history and point of view onto people who learn this, and no matter how many schools or societies try to teach people to be good, those parties that live among us in the shadows grab the attention of a few that slowly grows by numbers. People who feel lost and want to be a part of something they grew up hating now hear other points of view that feed it more to make it a genuine opinion, and they believe they are not the only ones thinking the "wrong" thing.

“Words spread by numerous voices is stronger than a single voice”.

Freedom of expression needs to have some control over wrong history and opinions that could be passed onto young minds and destroy them to believe it is okay to hate people and support an organization that committed atrocities in the past. Teaching the youth freedom of expression is a powerful tool that can change minds and a way of life. It can make the world a better place and prevent crimes, such as wars or the destruction of the world.

Freedom of expression was given to us so we could fight back if someone tries to destroy our way of life, that today there won't be another rising dictator who sees himself above everyone and can decide who lives and who dies. Freedom of expression is not absolute; we have "selective freedom" or "managed democracy." This form is the reality of our lives; it creates an illusion of freedom, but we don't truly have complete freedom. Freedom of expression is cheap; it is only words people say, but freedom of employment, education, and immigration are not entirely free. Of course, we can understand that there is a good reason for that: you have to earn your degree, and you have to have the proper experience for the right job, but when speaking of freedom as a whole, we perceive it as complete freedom. When we talk about anything we want, we feel we are free, and nothing holds us back, while in reality, our governments limit our freedom; sometimes, it can be the freedom of expression in some cases. What we need to understand is that if we allow freedom of expression to be entirely free, without restraints, without censorship, even if it creates organizations that spread hatred, why do we limit immigration freedom? If you can speak hatred onto someone's skin color, why would the government restrict your freedom to acquire a visa to move to the USA? In addition, some people can be limited from their freedom by those hateful groups; if a Mexican man tries to cross legally into the USA, a corrupt border officer can deny his entry even when he has done everything by the law.

Freedom of Expression in Fashion- continued.

Another aspect of freedom of expression is fashion, which has something much bigger.

Today, fashion has become one of the top phenomenon in human history. People dress in a way that expresses themselves, their way of life, or success; fashion has a rich history in cultures and nations that combine their ideas to design amazing clothes that people love to wear. Despite all the traditions and cultures in the clothing business, it was not entirely related to culture or national pride purposes only. Cultural clothing can make people feel closer to their nation. Still, the real reason is that there is a significant code activated here that most of it suits women, as women purchase the most clothing, and there are more options for women's styles than men do.

That reason is money. Fashion makes millions to billions a year just on fashion, mostly on women's products. It can also be explained why women need to feel beautiful through makeup or clothes rather than feel it on themselves. All those clothing brands work systematically to make women believe that without their products, they will never feel beautiful or attract men into their lives.

A man can tell his girlfriend she is the most beautiful girl he ever met, and she still won't believe him because she is still without makeup. This sort of propaganda works perfectly without people questioning it because men like it. Men want their women to be attractive in all ways that fashion can provide.

Fashion was a good term for culture and history. Still, it quickly changed to attractiveness and wealth, influencing women worldwide to believe they are useless without 100 dresses in their wardrobe or even fit enough to wear a nice dress. Fitness is also a code that allows most women to stay fit, not for health but for attraction.

The way people express themselves through the clothing they wear is particularly useless, as it will profile a few in a way that suggests criminal activity or makes a person interested in you, not in your personality but in your looks.

We all should remember that personality is more important, and the outside always must come last. Everybody's beautiful until they turn their hearts dark; expressing through clothing or tattoos will not show the real person, but it will give an insight into what that person might be. Mostly, it will turn into a guessing game that leads to nowhere.

People shouldn't put too much effort into clothing, either. One can pick a particular style and be okay with it, but we continuously hear people chasing trends or mixing more styles into their lives. Dress for comfort, not impression.

Vegan vs meat

The topic of veganism is causing considerable controversy in our world. There are predators out there eating each other every day, so why would the almighty allow animals to eat meat but humans possibly can't? Humans are considered at the top of the food chain, but animals can eat humans, too, and it does happen sometimes. The only problem is that humans do not control the amount of meat they consume, and for that comes the risk of animal species going extinct. Vegan societies believe that eating less meat or not eating meat at all will save the animals, but this is not how the world works. Imagine a deer was killed for food to serve 20 people, and five decided to go vegan; that won't save the deer. There will be others to take their place. Let's not forget the deer still died regardless of the numbers. Hunters will not spare him just because of 5 less. Not consuming meat can create weakness and some health problems for humans. We can understand from this that the almighty decision allowed us to eat meat, but we must control the amount to balance us and the animal kingdom. A cow lives an average of around 15-20 years. Why is that? Well, it's to help humans have a constant supply of meat to feed their population. Waiting 20 years is less than 90 years of the average human life span.

In addition, animals such as bees and sharks are essential for the earth's survival. These types of animals were created as a working force for the planet to continue thriving. We can see this evidence in the 2007 film Bee Movie. A bee wants its fellow bees to stop working so hard and humans to stop taking their honey, which results in catastrophic environmental change that prevents plants and trees from growing.

On the other hand, sharks are suitable for the ocean Ecosystem. Without sharks, population growth could spiral out of control, leading to significant problems like a lack of marine resources. Children's movies are very much based on these concepts. They make strong messages as children's movies, not adults because they wish to educate people from a younger age to respect the animal kingdom and know its value to the world.

Animals and humans are also different in their way of life, but that doesn't stop humans from imitating the animals' lifestyle. In the animal kingdom, the saying: 'only the strong survive' is something humans use against each other. Humans see animals killing each other, and they justify it themselves by waging wars, But who said you gotta be strong to survive in a human world? You have many ways to live your life that don't need to involve danger or any form of struggle. Although humans struggle daily, it's the whole point of failure here. The quote positively impacts people, motivating them and making them feel powerful when facing difficult times. But it is best to remember that both species differ on many levels. Instincts drive animals. Humans are driven by logic.

From Failure to Success

The human race must understand that the earth, the animals, classes, education, and everything else are all our responsibility. The reason why we are here is that we all have our part in this world. We can change it for the better together or keep using all these systematic systems against each other. If we are not trusted enough to take care of our planet, we will be forced to end up having a life we are not happy to have. The earth is big and it won't be damaged if one person does anything harmful to it, but when it comes to billions of people, our planet will die and will take everybody and everything with it, everything that was beautiful. The earth requires a balance between everything; it cannot give everything to one specific race, for it is also selfish.

Our job as the top race with the greatest minds is to overcome anything, unite as a race, and save ourselves and our planet. We are not here to dominate the animals; we are here to protect them, and they have their roles in this world, too. The animals require a leader to guide them in their way, but it does not mean we should keep animals in zoos. No, we need to allow animals to live in their natural places, but when they stray off those places, we must intervene to get them back there.

Keeping animals at the zoo is the same as keeping them in prison. They need their freedom and follow their natural instincts. They will not survive in nature if we take their instincts by growing them in zoos

.

The human race and the animal kingdom can live in harmony and balance if we put all our differences aside and work toward a better future. Our world, our planet, will live on.

Thanks For Reading